The Silent Lady and the Mona Lisa

From the river we could see nothing at all of the town, as nearly all the trees, chiefly large sycamores and oaks, had been left standing along the bank, though the river itself, at the same time, evinced the neighborhood of a large and busy place by all kinds and varieties of vessels, which lay there, some moored, others stopped to land passengers, and some in fact run aground; among them, two large full ships which must have come up here with very high water, and were now lying dolefully upon their beam-ends.
